I would state for the information of the equirers that they will find substantially the machine now offered by several pretending inventors, described in the lettly column of the Repertery of Arts, invented by Samuel Bentham, in the year 1701. The main road from the Lago Maggiore to the western parts of Switzerland at one time ran through the valley of Anzasca; and it was once my fortune to be detained all night at a cottage in one of its wildest defiles, by a storm which tendered my horse ungovernable. While-laming up; on my bench, and looking with drowsy currosity rowards the window—for there was no bed except my host; of which I did not choose to deprive hirs—I saw a small, faint light, among the focks in the distance. I at first conceived that it might proceed from a cottage window; but remembering that that part of the mountain was wholly unnhabitable, I roused my self, and calling one of the family inquired what it meant—While I spoke, the light suddenly vanished; but in about a nate, reappeared in another place, as if the beaver had gone round some intervening rock. The storm at that time raged with a forwhich threatened to blow our hat, with the men and horses, over the mountainer; and the might was so intensely dark, that the deges of the horzon were wholly undistinguishable from the sky.

"There it is again," wild I. What is that, in the name of God?"

"There it is again," said L. 'What is that, in the name of God?"

"It is Lelia's lamp!" cried the young man, eagerly, who was the son of our host. "Awake, father! Ho, But's t'-Vittorio! Lelia is on the monatain." At these cries the whole family sprang up from their lair at once, and, crowding mound the window, fixed their eyes upon the light, which continued to appear, although at long intervals, for a considerable part of the night.—When interrogated as to the nature of this mystic lump, the cottagers made no scruple of telling me all they knew, on the sole condition that I should be salent when it appeared, and leave them to mark uninterruptedly the spot where it rested.

To render my story intelligible, it is necessary to say, that the inherati and farmers form two distinct classes in the valley of Anzasca. The occupation of the former, when pursued as a profession, is reckned disreputable by the inhabitant, who obtain their living by regular industry, and, indeed, obtain their living by regular industry; and, indeed, the manners of the minerali offer some exense, for wary; or they called under the banner of these reg-ular banditti, who rob in thousands, and whose what banditti, who rob in thousands, and whose body is a province or a kingdom.

Francesco Martelli was, the handsomest gold-seeker in the valley. He was wild, it is true, but that was the badge of his tribe; and he made up for this by so many good qualities that the farmers themselves—at least, such of them as had not marriageable daughter—delighted in his company. Francesco could sing ballads so sweetly and mournfully, that the old dames leaned back in the chimney corner to weep, while he sung. He had that deep and unclanchely voice which, when once heard, lugges in the ears, and when heard again, however mospectedly, seems like a longing realized.

There was only one young lass in the valley, who had never heard the songs of Francesco. All the others, seen or unstend, on some pactest or they had creditly their working the.

who had never heard the songs of Francesco. All the others, seen or unseen, on some protect or other, had gratified their curiosity. The exception was belia, the daughter of one of the richest farmers in Anasca. But in her quality of an only daughter, with a dowry in expectancy equal to more than one thousand Austrain linas, the attracted considerable observation. Her face, on minute inspection, was beautiful to absolute perfection; but her figure, although symmetrical, was so petite, and her manner so shy and grills; that so petac, and her manner so shy and girlish that she was thought of more as a child than a young reconan. The "heiress of old Niccoii" was the designation made use of, whon parents would endeaver to awaken the ambition of their sons, as they tooked forward to what might be some years have a but Likis in her some years. hence : but Lelia, in her own person, was a non-

on the second and the second and the second and the mother had died in giving her birth; and for many a year the life of the child had been preserved, or rather her death provented, by what seemed a miracle. Even after the disease, what had violated to the steepever it might have been, had yielded to the sleep-less care of her father, she remained in the state which is described in the expression "not unwell" which is described in the expression "not unweil?" rather than in perfect health; although the most troublesome memento that remained of her illness was nothing more than a nervous timidity, which in a more civilized part of the country might have passed for delicacy of feeling.

Besides being in some degree shut out from the society of her equals by this peculiarity of her stantion, she was prevented from enjoying it by another. While her body languished, the cultisation of her mind had advanced. Music, to which she was passionately attached, paved the way for poetry; and poetry, in spite of the dectimes of a certain school you have in England, unfitted her for association with the ignorant and times of a certain school you have in England, untitted her for association with the ignorant and moethed. That Lelia, therefore, had nover sought to hear the ballads of Francesso was occasioned, it may readily be believed, by nothing more than instinctive terror, mingled with the dislike with which the name of one of the ration minerall inspired her; and, in tuth, she listened to the tales that from time to time reached her ear, of the young gold-seeker, with somewhat of the young gold-seeker, with somewhat of the young gold-seeker, with which we attend to descriptions of a beautiful but wild guad cruci animal of another hemisphere.

There came one at last however, to whom poor Lalia listened. She was sitting alone, according to be a usual yestom, at the bottom of her father's

Her voice was surely loud enough to be caught by the echoes of the opposite toeks; although sometimes it did happen that, carried away by enthusiasm, she produced a tone which was repeated by the fairty uninstrels of the glen. On the present occasion she listened with surprize to a similar effect, for her voice had died almost in a whisper. She amy another stanza in a louder key. The challenge was accepted; and a rich, sweet voice took up the strain of her favorite ballad where she had dropped it. Lelia's first impulse was to fly; her droped it. Lelia's first impulse was to flyt her second to sit still and watch for a renewal of the music; and her hird, which she obeyed, to steal on tipice to the edge of the ravine, and look down into the abyss, from whence the voice seemed to proceed. The echo she discovered was a young man, cagaged in mavigating a raif down the river such as is used by the peasantry of the Alps to that themselves and their wares to market, and which at this moment was stranded on the shore, at the bot of the garden. He leant upon an can as if in the act of pralung off his chunsy beat; but fast lee was turned, like one watching for the appearance of a star; and Lelia filt a sudden conviction, she knew not why, that he had seen he throthet trees while she sat singing and had adopted this method of attracting her. It such was his purpose he seemed dropped it. Lelia's first impulse was to fly; her second to sit still and watch for a renewal of the this method of attracting her attention without at uning her. If such was his purpose, he seemed to have no alterior view; tor, after gazing for an instant, ho withdrew his eyes in confusion, and, pashing off the crift, dropped rapidly down the race, and was soon out of sight.

Lelia's life was as calm as a sleeping lake, which a cloud will blacken and the wing of an insect disturb. Even this liftle incident was matter for thought, and entered into the soft reverses of sixturb. She felt her checks tingle as she wondered her bloom the young man had gazed at her thro! Lelia's life was as raim as a sleeping lake, which a cloud will blacken and the wing of an insect disturb. Even this little incident was matter for transplit, and entered into the soft reveries of sixture. She felt her checks tingle as she wondered has long the voning man had grazed at her throthe trees, and why he had slockeded in attracting for attention. There was delicacy in his little contribution to see her the surprise, perhaps the terror of seeing a stranger in such a situation; there was modely in the confusion with which he turned away his lead; and, what perhaps was as valuable as either, even to the goarde Lelia, there was comiration deep and devour in those brilliant eyes, that qualled beneath hers. The youth was as clear, and yet so soft—so powerful, and yet so and set of the goarde Lelia; there was seelear, and yet so soft—so powerful, and yet. as reaution as a unsum; and this voice!—it voice ear, and yet so soft—so powerful, and yet melodious! It haunted her like a prediction. miledious! It haunted her like a prediction, it was a weak before she again saw this Apollo of her girlish imagination. It seemed as if in the interval they had had time to get acquainted!—They exchanged salutations—the next time they spoke, and the next time they concersed. There was nothing my-terious in their communications. He was probably a farmer's son of the upper valley, who had been attracted, like others, by the lame of the heiress of old Niccoli. He, indeed, knew nothing of books, and he lawed poetry more

Inow nothing of books, and he loved poetry more for the sake of music than its own; but what of that Y—the writings of God were around and

He skinned along the edge of the precipies, and spaing from rock to rock in the torrent, as featless as the channels. He was beautiful, and proud and brave; and this glorious creature, with addinate eyes and glowing checks, laid humself (from at her feet, to gaze upon her face, as poets worship the moon!

The world, before o monotonous, so blank, so dran, was now a heaven to poor Lelfa. One thing only perplexed her; they were sufficiently long—according to the calculation of sixteen—and sufficiently well acquainted: then sentiments had been avowed without degules their faith pilipited belond recall; and as yet her lover had never mentioned his name. Lolfa, reflecting on this circumstance, condemned for the moment, her precipitation, but there was now no help for it, and she could only resolve to extort the secret—if secretif was—at the next meeting.

"But I will not be said may. You must tell me now—or at all events, to-morrow night."

"Why to-morrow night?"

"Because a young fielt suitor, on whom my father's heart is set, is then to propose, in proper form, for this poor hand; and, let the confession cost what it may, I will not overthrow the deauest plans of may only parent, without giving a reason which will satisfy even him. Oh, you do not know him! Wealth weighs as nothing in the scale against his daughter's happiness. You may be poor for aught I know; but you are good, and therefore, in his eyes, no unfitting match for Leha."

It was almost dark; but Lelia thought she It was almost dark; but Lelia thought she perceived a sinde on her lover's face while she spoke, and a gay suspicion flashed through her mind, which made her heart beat and her checketingle. He did not answer for many minutes; a struggle of some kind scenned to agitate him; but at length, in a suppressed voice, he said—"To-morrow night, then." "Here?" They are, notwithstuading a fine race of men; brave, hardy, and often landsome. They spend fixely what they win lightly; and if one day they sleep off their hunger, lying like wild animals, basking in the sun, the next, if fortune has been propitions, they swagger about, gallant and gay, the lords of the valley.

Like the sons of Gon, the minerali sometimes make love to the daughters of men; and although they seldom possess the hand, they occasionally touch the heart of the gentle maidens of Anizaca. If their wooing is unsuccessful, there are comrades still wilder than their own, whose arms are always open to receive the desperate and the brave. They change the scene, and betake themselves to the highways, when highes are dark and travelers unwary; or they callist make the residence of those regular banditit, who rob in thousands, and whose parts and the sport of an idle moment 2-- and was the saile which spect of an idle moment 2-- and was the saile which she had observed on her lover's face which which connamided a view of the received the sport of an idle moment 2-- and was the saile which she had observed on her lover's face which she had observed on her lover's face which which connections in the saile which she had observed on her lover's face when the protection is a specific to the control of the production of the sail of the production of the from the Val d'Ossola to Monte Rosa. The youth was rich, well-looking, and prudent even to coldness—what more could a father desire?

Lelia had put off the moment of appearing in the porch, where the eldest of both families had assembled, as long as possible. While mechanically avanging her dress, she continued to gaze out of the lattice, which commanded a view of the rocal and the paties below, in expectation that increased to agony. Bitter were her reflections during that intenval! She was almost tempted to believe that what had passed was nothing more than a dream—a figurent of her imagination, dis-the peach with a trembling step and a levered cheek.

The sight of the company that awaited her awed and depressed her. She shank from them with more than morbid tingidity; while their stoney eyes, fixed upon her in all the rigidity of form and transmitted custom, seemed to freeze her very heart. There was one there, however, whose ideas of "propriety," strict as they were, could never prevent his eyes from glistening and his arms from extending at the converse of Lelia. could never prevent his eyes from glistening and his arms from extending, at the approach of Lelia. Her firther, after holding her for a moment at ann's length, as with a doating look his eye wandered over the bravery of her new white dress, drew her close to his bosom and blessed her. "My child," said he, smiling gaily through a gathering tear, "it it hard for an old man to think of parting with all he loves in the world; but the laws of nature must be respected. Young men will love, and young lasses will like, to the end of time; and new families will spring up out of their union. It is the way, girl—it is the fate of maids, and there's an end. For sixteen years I have watched over you, even like a miser.

All I ask, on your part, is obedience—my, and cheerful obedience—after the manner of our uncestors, and according to the laws of God. After this is over, let the old man stand a dec. on pass away, when it pleases Heaven; he has left hus child happy, and his child's children will bless his memory. He has drunk of the cup of life-sweet and bitter—bitter and sweet—even to the bottom; but with honey, Lelia—thanks to his blessed darling!—with honey in the dregs!" Long Hair

She was sitting alone, according to her usual custom, at the bottom of her father's garden, singing, while she plied her knitting accille, in the soft low tone peculiar to her voice, and levond which it had no compass. The only fence of the garden at this place was a belt of strubs, which enriched the border of the deep ravine it overlooked. At the bottom of this ravine flowed the river, mpid and yet suffer; and levond, scancely distant two hundred yards, a range of precipitons claffs shut in the horizon.—
The wild and desolute aspect of the scene was overshadowed and controlled, as it were, by the stern grundern of these ramparts of nature; and the whole contributed to form such a picture artists travel a theusand miles to contemplate, belia, however, had looked upon it from child-hood. It had never been forced upon her imagination by contrast, for she had never traveled hive only force of the opposite toeks; although sometimes it did happen that, carried away by enthusiasm, she produced a tone which was repeated by the fairw uninstrels of the glen. CIRCLE OF CORRESPONDENCE."-Son fow weeks since, we were farmed with a circular rom sundry benevolent gentlemen in New York, who proposed to furnish us with a weekly letter rom that city, on the condition of being allowed to insert therein, "occasionally, a kindly notice of a friend." The idea was an ingenious one: the gentlemen getting their pay from the business men "noticed," or, in other words, advertised, in such papers as accept the offer.

CENTRAL RAILROAD LOAN.-We learn from Mr. A.
